Peter Moskowitz, is a journalist, writer, and activist. He’s based in Philadelphia but spends time in New York City, where he grew up and where his family still lives. He writes about a range of issues, with a special focus on social justice. According to Peter, journalism is the only profession that allows him to enter people's living rooms and ask them their deepest secrets without being immediately kicked out. His book How to Kill a City is a narrative journey through gentrification in four U.S. cities. His work has appeared in The New York Times, The New Republic, The Guardian, New York Magazine, Al Jazeera America, Wired, Fusion, BuzzFeed, VICE and many other places. He co-founded Study Hall, a coworking space for non-fiction writers, in the fall of 2015 with a mission to build community within the freelance world.
